On the floor.

(...) Yet the bank is still way from turning this vision into reality. A banking consultant quips that the maths of the Dresdner deal amount to "one plus one equals one". And domestic focus has its downsides. Fierce local competition from the savings banks and co-operatives will not go away. Nor will the drag from the euro zone's economic prospects: interest rates will remain low as long as inflation stays subdued.

So Mr Blessing and his team have little choice but to concentrate on the nuts and bolts. That includes making more cuts in branches and staff (branches have already fallen from about 1,500 to 1,200), controlling their tempo so that the bank can reap savings without battering its franchise. One part of this is greater flexibility in the offerings at each branch. Not every location needs an expert in everything: more advice can be given online or over the phone. Another is growth in its online divisions, comdirect. Commerzbank has the scale to build a sophisticated offering; savings banks and co-operatives may not.

Such strengths should eventually return Commerzbank to fitness. But the miserable share price suggests that investors expect a period of plodding before it is back to running at full tilt. <sup>1</sup>
